

Ismael Malavé-Pérez, Jr.

Ismael Malavé-Pérez, Jr. has spent over 27 years in public service, including 16 years working under five Comptrollers—three at the state level and two at the city level. With deep expertise in financial oversight, procurement, and operational efficiency, he is uniquely qualified to serve as New York City's chief financial officer.

A graduate of the Zicklin School of Business at Baruch College (MBA) and Lehman College (CUNY) with a Bachelor's in Economics, Ismael has led cost-saving initiatives that have saved the city millions. He played a key role in implementing a citywide computerized maintenance management system, streamlining operations across agencies, and served as an expert witness in a major commercial lawsuit, helping the city avoid significant financial losses. His work as an Administrative Procurement Analyst further underscores his knowledge of budget management, contract oversight, and fiscal accountability.

A devoted husband and father of two, Ismael has spent his career fighting for the financial well-being of working families, retirees, and city employees. His campaign for NYC Comptroller focuses on expanding financial literacy, defending the prevailing and affordable living wage, and ensuring that first responders and uniformed city staff receive the support they deserve.

Guided by his personal mantra, "I'm On My Way," Ismael embodies perseverance, integrity, and a steadfast commitment to public service. As NYC Comptroller, he will ensure transparency, protect taxpayer dollars, and manage the city's pension system with responsibility and foresight—because every New Yorker deserves a city that works for them.